to me

We headed for the south slope trails of Burnaby Mountain under a flawless sky, opting to take the North Road Trail then connecting to the Powerline before turning into the forest and network of well used pathways. We enjoyed the shady paths, which were exceptionally dry. We navigated our way despite gaps in the signage and avoided mishaps with bikers who showed up suddenly on hiking trails as well as the shared biking and hiking trails. We conducted a quick tour of the quiet and pretty "UniverCity" on our break at the mountain top and explored one science building on campus, for it was the first time at SFU for one of us. We took in the spectacular view of Richmond and Delta, of course. Another reward for the hike up! To complete a loop, we sought a different path back down and managed well, especially owing to the kindness of other trail users.
